The era of the Weimar Hyperinflation is an important time in the history of Germany. Almost everyone knows the famous anecdote about how the Germans in those days had to carry a wheelbarrow full of German marks to the market in order to buy a mere loaf of bread, but many of them know neither what the causes nor the solutions of this problem were. This paper examines the origins of the problem of this hyperinflation, including financial policy, reparations under the Treaty of Versailles, public debt, and psychological factors. This paper will also illuminate the solution to the hyperinflation and the socio-economic and psychological effects on the various social classes. This history gives a good insight into the mentality of the German people in the time between the World Wars.
